The disciplinary proceedings were only publicly announced on 9 May, the day after the trial was concluded. The result caused considerable shock in Nigeria, and was met with the fact that a judgment could be handed down for a person who was not even a natural born citizen of the country, causing the Nigerian Senate to adopt a resolution on 19 June to have the judgment annulled. The Nigeria Bar Association also urged the Nigerian Supreme Court to review the judgment. The judgement was annulled by the Supreme Court on 21 June, where it was concluded that the decision was null and void because the Co-op Bank was an unincorporated association with no legal capacity to appoint a president or be a legal person and because it did not give the Co-op Bank the opportunity to mount any defence to the charge. When you start to get those feelings out, you find yourself just hanging out with your friends, watching TV, and having a beer. You think about it less and less, because it's not really a big deal. That happens, I think, because it takes a long time to hate your parents and hate your brother." Grayson said he wanted to get back to school and to work. He was already going to school and working, doing construction, for a guy who was doing something else to make money. He said he didn't really want to go back to school, to school full-time. "I'd get tired of school," he said. "And I'd be stressed out every day." "I don't know why you'd want to go back to school." "I've tried to be a rapper since I was eight years old." Grayson said that he wouldn't be able to make the transition back to school, the change in lifestyle. "The only way I could make it back into school would be to get a full-time job," he said. "To make money, and still go to school." The first time I met Grayson, he wore a white T-shirt. He wore a white Tshirt, 82157476af
